Purpose of the policy paper

1. How do models of social enterprises and inclusive businesses vary across ACP countries?
2. What are the varied needs of these organisations?
3. What are the opportunities and innovations to support these organisations to become more sustainable solutions to social, economic, environmental challenges?

Varying needs of social enterprises and inclusive businesses

There is no formal definition for a social enterprise or inclusive business across ACP countries, but there is a general understanding of what they do

Social enterprises are not defined in policy or legislation across the majority of countries in each region

In Sub-Saharan Africa, only South Africa explicitly recognised social enterprise in its policies

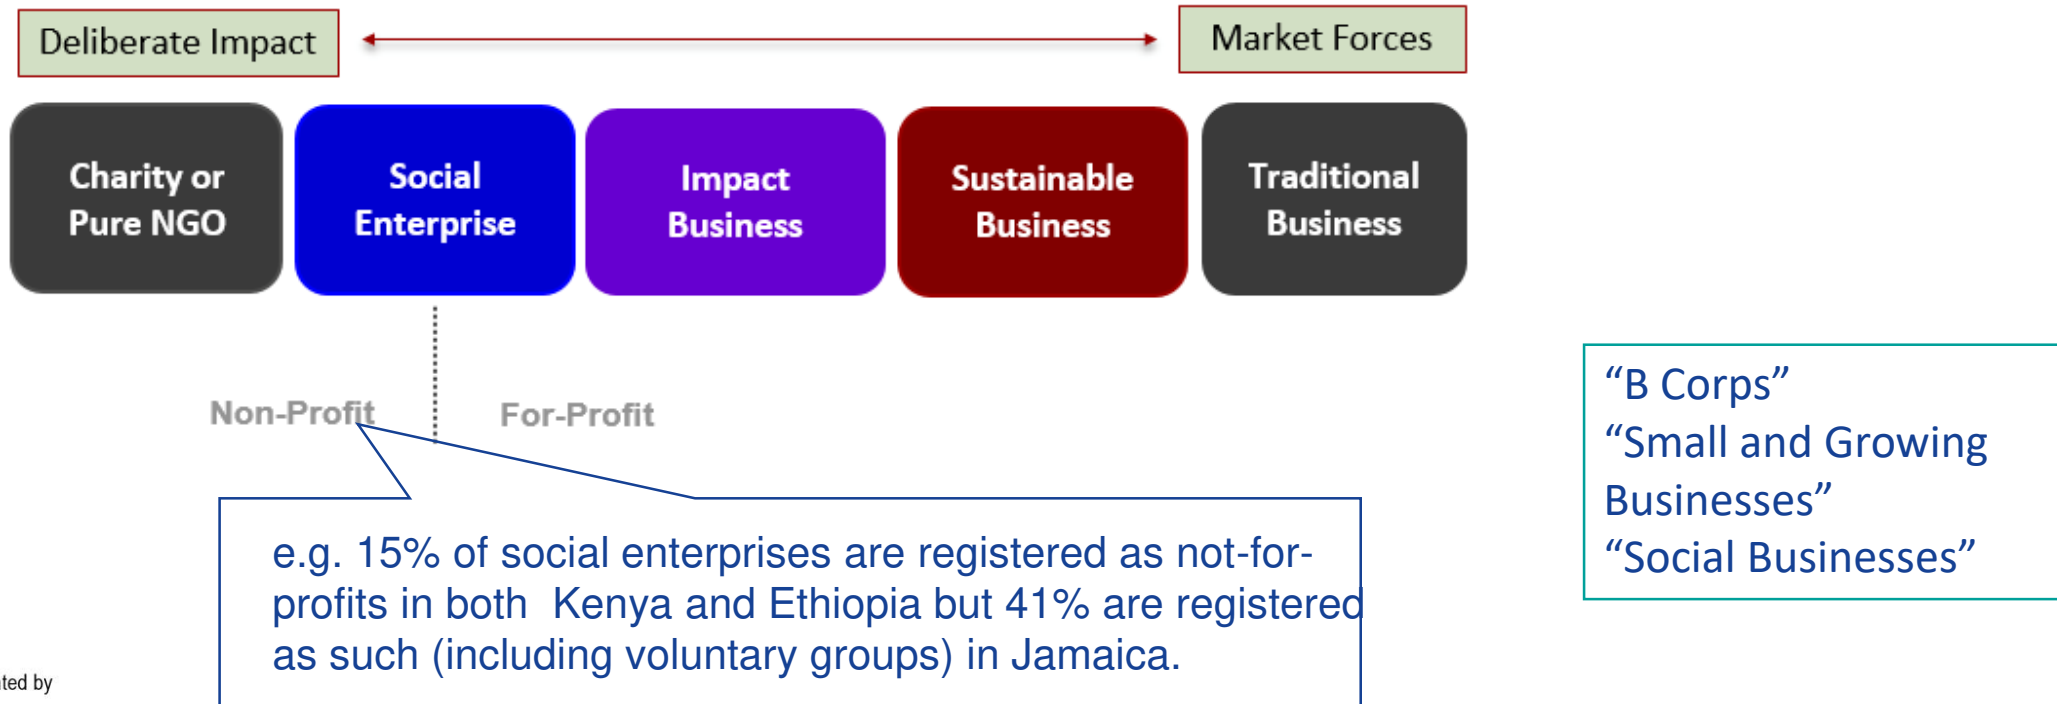

Across all countries, most social enterprises do not have coherent policy frameworks to turn to.

Differences among social enterprises: how they scale, their level of maturity, sectors, target communities and needs of the entrepreneurs

30 years old ↑

“Not scaling” may not be a bad thing, particularly if the business is still able to deliver investor returns as well as community benefit social entrepreneurs aged over 30 and with some industry experience are more likely to succeed and are preferable for investment (anecdotal evidence)

Social enterprises are led by and employ more women than private sector firms in certain African countries, but also find it harder to access capital

Factors impacting social enterprises' ability to operate, fundraise and thrive

Lack of policy framework and favourable legislation: taxation, barriers for certain new industries

Issues around financing: Financing options limited by legal forms and asset base; lack of risk and impact-focused capital; loans available are too large

70% of Social Enterprises Ghana members require less than $50k

Internal operational challenges: managerial, technical and organisational skills; attracting and retaining staff

Barriers faced by enterprises in the social finance ecosystem

Issues around financing pose some of the biggest challenges, and the majority of social enterprises depend on donations and grants.

Across African and Caribbean countries:

- Lack of access to debt or equity, grant funding, and donations
- Very few social enterprises can use loans or equity.

38% not received any source of funding.

The top two reported sources of funding: donations (19%) and grants from foundations (13%)

a mix of government funds (27%);
local foundations and endowments (18%);
international donor agencies (17%)
individual donors (30%).

Barriers faced by enterprises in the social finance ecosystem

Western investors across ACP countries may bring additional barriers to accessing finance

The vast majority of start-ups that receive venture capital in East Africa are founded by expats from the West or by those who have received education abroad.

However, they tend to privilege entrepreneurs with ambitions to scale, but these expectations are not in line with most social enterprises and inclusive businesses in ACP countries.

Recommendations: The Role of Policy Makers

Government as a market facilitator, participant, and regulator

Facilitator

- Build network: Pacific RISE as a “broker” to build a network between social enterprises and investors across 14 Pacific island countries
- Build capacity: in the Caribbean countries, the Entrepreneurship Program for Innovation

Participant

- Social procurement: in South Africa, previously disadvantaged black-owned businesses are prioritised in the government and corporate supply chain.

Regulator

- Tax relief: in Ethiopia, tax relief was offered to companies affected by the fallout from COVID
